Expiration time

DNS records have an expiration time (time to live/TTL), so that they need not be queried permanently anew and can be cached by querying systems (Caching). This expiration time must be considered when changes are planned. The default expiration time of DNS records in the ZIH name service is a day (86.400 seconds).

If this expiration time is too long, it must be reduced before a change. If you need this, state this clearly in your change request.
